The Gold Seeker.
The Dantzig Zeitung relates a curious anecdote of the superstition which prevails among the peasant cutters of Litta. In the great peat fields at Niederung, where the Will o' the Wisp or Irilcher (wandering light) as it is called in Germany, is often seen. The gaseous miasma in this district gives the uncanny light a remarkable brilliancy. It is the fervid belief of the Littauers, in spite of the school masters, that, wherever the wandering fire is kindled, there the devil is busy smelling the gold which he pays to those human beings who sell themselves to him. If any person will lay a pair of slippers with their soles upward upon the spot where the fire is kindled, the power of the devil over the gold is immediately broken; he is compelled to leave it, the light is extinguished, and the fortunate owner of the slippers can at once dig for the gold, and when he finds it, appropriate it to his own use without any sin and without danger.

A few days ago, according to a Danzig paper, a Littauer peasant named Eugen Karthner saw one of the errant lights, or as he would have expressed it, caught the devil at work, in one of his own peat bogs. He seized a pair of slippers, rushed out of his house, and followed the light. The light moved further and further, and the peasant, forgetting everything else in his determination to spoil Satan of his gold, hurried onward and onward, until he stuck in a deep boggy slough and was drowned. Early the next morning his lifeless corpse was dragged out of the slough. It was only discovered by the accident that his cap was floating on the surface.
